VOICE OVER: Good morning, everyone.

What a lovely day, but it's cold, isn't it? It's like a freezer out there. I certainly needed my woolly jacket. David, feel the radiator. Is it hot? Okay, well, perhaps it will get toasty in a bit.

Okay, so today we are going to pick up on yesterday's discussion about the Tudors, Henry VIII and life at court. We learned about how unpredictable the King was and some of the tensions in his life. Today we're going to look at how ordinary people lived.

Please sit down, Peter and Ann. And Margaret, be quiet and get your book.

All right, yesterday we talked about how perilous life could be for those at court. Today we're going to think about what ordinary people experienced and some of the perils they faced. What sorts of things do you think would be bad for them living in this time?

That's right, Angela. Most ordinary people were very poor, but what would that mean?

Margaret, I won't tell you again.

If you are poor today, what does that mean? Yes, Alan, that's right.

You would have state benefit, but what would happen in Tudor times? No state benefit. Yes, that's right. People would not be able to buy food, and they might get ill. What happens now if you are poor and get ill? Yes, yes, you go to the doctor's or you go to the hospital, because it's free and there are medicines and cures for sickness. But think about this time, no free medicine, no antibiotics, no cures for simple illnesses.
